LEADER OF GREEK REBELLION SEEKS REFUGE AT CASSOS

Cruiser Continues to Arsenal To Surrender After Party Disembarks

REBELS ARE DEFEATED

Courts Martial Underway, With Scores of Death Sentences Expected

ATHENS, Greece, Mar. 12—Former Premier Venizelos, leader of the rebellion crushed by loyal Greek forces, disembarked from the armored cruiser Averoff on the Isle of Cassos in the Dodecanese group. Venizelos was accompanied by his wife and a number of rebel officers. All hoped to be granted a sanctuary in the islands which are owned by Italy. The Averoff proceeded to the Salamis Arsenal to surrender.

ATHENS, Mar. 12—(INS)—Greece today recaptured her island territories from rebel hands.

Faced with almost certain defeat following collapse of the land revolt in Macedonia, ex-Premier Eleutherios Venizelos and his revolutionary lieutenants escaped from Crete aboard the cruiser Averoff, pride of the Greek Navy.

All other vessels, with the exception of one submarine, that the rebels had confiscated and used to extend their rule of ten days to the islands of L. sbos, Chios, and Samos, were recovered by the government.

With the revolt claimed by the government to have been crushed on land and sea, authorities prepared today to mete out severe punishment for the vanquished.

Courts martial began functioning and scores of death sentences were expected to be imposed upon leaders of the several thousand rebels captured in the debacle in Macedonia.

Formal demand was delivered in Sofia, Bulgaria, for extradition of General Demetrius Kamenos and the 22 members of his military staff who fled across the border after the disorderly retreat before the onslaught of Field Marshal George Kondylis, Minister of War, in the Struma river front yesterday.

The Greek consul at Philippopolis, Bulgaria, hurried to the frontier to demand arrest of other rebel leaders and succeeded in recovering more than $600,000 taken from banks in Seres and other points when held by the revolutionaries.

The mayor of Athens called a giant mass-meeting of thanksgiving this afternoon. War Minister Kondylis, returning like a conquering hero, and Premier Panayoti Tsaldaris were to be speakers.

Government casualties in the entire Macedonian fighting were put at only 11 killed and 28 wounded. Rebel losses ran into the hundreds, chiefly from disastrous airplane bombardments.

The goal of the defeated rebel leader Venizelos, who was also reported to be accompanied by his wife, was unknown. He faced a possible modern Odyssey, with many nearby Mediterranean ports closed to him.

Rear Admiral Coliataxis was frustrated by police when he attempted to land yesterday at Alexandria, Egypt.

The machine was parked in the yard pending its sale, and authorities advanced the opinion the men got in the car to sleep. Both were burned beyond recognition.

Free 32 Cock Pheasants; Greater Supply Needed

Bristol Fish and Game Protective Association liberated on Saturday 32 ringneck pheasants, all cock birds. They were set free in Bristol, Falls and Middletown Townships.

According to officials of the association the number purchased is limited, and but a small fraction of the needed supply, owing to the fact that membership fees paid have been few, and it is from these funds that restocking is possible. A spokesman for the association stated today that a supply of 100 more cock birds would be necessary to bring up the total to where it should be. During the past hunting season birds were scarce. A number of hen birds were reported.

If needed funds are received through new memberships the supply of cock birds for liberation will be increased, and stocking of the lower portion of the county greatly aided. An appeal is made to sportsmen to aid in this endeavor.

DEMOCRATS JITTERY OVER TAX PROTESTS

Governor Almost Hopeless of Success for Any Major Items of Bill

MEASURE IS UNDER FIRE

(Special to Courier)
HARRISBURG, Mar. 12—The Earle tax program is under such heavy fire from every quarter of Pennsylvania and from every class of citizens that the Governor is almost hopeless of success for any of its major items. Never in the history of the Legislature has expressed dissatisfaction been so general with respect to any proposal ever made by a new Governor.

The whole Democratic outfit is jittery. Floor-leader Frank Ruth, who broke under the strain placed upon him by the Democratic bosses, lost 13 pounds in weight since he came to Harrisburg—and Ruth is a thin man at best.

The ordinary calmness of Speaker Sarig has been replaced by loud-voiced denunciations of legislators he has been unable to control. At one time last week he bellowed from the rostrum that the "members are behaving like a lot of school boys."

The Governor himself became so excited when Representative Morton Witkin, Republican leader in the House, put in a graded income tax bill that a few minutes later he announced the Administration also would have that kind of a bill.

This was taken as direct admission that the Governor realized his own program is doomed to defeat.

Nevertheless, the Democrats are still bent on budgeting the House into submission on taxes.

Meanwhile, the Republican delegation, which has been playing a waiting game, is noting that public sentiment is rapidly crystallizing behind a tax program that will have general support.

Nothing like this has ever been observed in the Legislature. It is an evidence of the wisdom of the Republican leaders who at the outset decided to attempt to find out what the public desired, instead of trying to force an unpleasant dose down the taxpayers' throats, as the Democrats have unsuccessfully endeavored to do.

With taxes rapidly coming to the place where intelligent decisions can be reached, Republicans are now turning their attention toward proposed expenditures.

They do not mean to let the new Governor pile up huge revenues that may not be needed. They are scanning his budget very closely, and they are finding that his much boasted savings of $16,000,000 are not savings at all. Of the reductions eleven millions have been "saved" at the expense of the schools of the State, while other "savings" are for the most part covered by expenses that have naturally eliminated themselves and would not have been renewed no matter who was Governor.

As illustrating budget misrepresentations, Norman Gage, in his widely syndicated column, Pencil-Vania, says: "Educators and Republican leaders are already working up a fever over what they say is a popular belief that the 1935-37 budget makes a $16,000,000 reduction in payrolls and unnecessary State services. They are preparing to dispel such an illusion as soon as the turmoil over new taxes subsides a little."

"When the uproar starts, the Re-

Blaze Threatens Garages; One Truck Is Damaged

Fire shortly before nine o'clock last night threatened a row of six garages on Second avenue owned by Rosie Manna, Red Bank, N. J.

An old truck owned by Carlo Accardi was damaged by the blaze as were also several of the garages. The fire, it is believed, originated in the one occupied by the Accardi truck where it fed upon gasoline and spread to the other garages in the row.

Consolidated firemen responded and quickly quenched the flames. A large crowd of spectators were attracted to the scene.

The loss to the garages is placed at $150.

UNTOLD STORIES OF HAUPTMANN CASE

By JAMES L. KILGALLEN, Star Reporter of the Trial

BRUNO CONFESSION DEEMED UNLIKELY

"Jimmy" Kilgallen, outstanding reporter at the Lindbergh kidnap trial, continues his description of his exclusive interview with Bruno Richard Hauptmann, with which he prefaces his series on the untold stories of the Hauptmann trial, in the second article. After answering questions most often asked by the general public now concerning the trial, Mr. Kilgallen proceeds to provide new light on the case with an account of his work during and after the drama in Flemington which was the climax of the "crime of the century."

By JAMES L. KILGALLEN
International News Service Staff Correspondent
(Copyright, 1935, By International News Service)

NEW YORK, Mar. 12—(INS)—Bruno Richard Hauptmann does not fear for himself the prospect of dying in the electric chair. His concern is for his wife, his child and his mother.

The condemned man told me this in the most comprehensive interview he has granted since his arrest last September.

Hauptmann was leaning against the bars of his cell as he talked. His demeanor was calm, almost detached. We talked about a lot of things before I brought the subject around to the electric chair.

As tactfully as possible I asked him how he felt about the prospects of dying in the electric chair. His voice was low as he replied:

"You can imagine how I feel. For myself, I have no fear. I feel only for my wife and my child and my old mother in Germany. My conscience is clear. If I have to die, I will die like a man. Certainly."

Of his own volition he added:

"The thing that is holding me up now is my wife and my child and the knowledge that I am innocent."

I stood there in the corridor outside his cell trying to figure out this strange man. I had heard Wilentz characterize him as an arch liar. Was he lying to me?

If he was, he was doing a smooth job of it and has a lot of actor in his make up. There certainly was sincerity in his voice and manner and he looked me in the eye when he said it. Somehow, I cannot imagine Hauptmann quaking as he walks "the last mile." He just doesn't seem to be the type. Think of his remarkable coolness on the witness stand. Both in the Bronx during his extradition hearing and at his trial in Flemington for murder. The most vicious questions failed to break his nerve.

I have seen them executed. I saw Ruth Snyder and Judd Gray electrocuted at Sing Sing. Ruth "broke." Judd didn't. I saw "Iron Irene" Schroeder and Glenn Dague "burn" at Bellefonte, Pa., and both sat in that deadly contraption known as "the chair" without flinching. I covered the hanging of Gerald Chapman at Hartford, Conn., and he took it coolly. I cannot imagine Hauptmann, a man who faced death as a machine gunner in the Kaiser's army, losing his nerve at the last minute.

"Did Hauptmann actually kidnap the Lindbergh baby?"

This is a question that has a double viewpoint and which to this day provokes sharp difference of opinion wherever it is debated. I don't know, of course.

I do know he was convicted on circumstantial evidence on this point

SCOUTS AND LEADERS EAGER FOR MEETING HERE

Expect Hundreds to Attend Session in the Methodist Church

NEXT MONDAY EVENING

Hundreds of men and boys are looking forward to Monday evening, when the Bucks County Council will hold its annual meeting at Bristol in the Methodist Church. It is to be a banner meeting in Scouting, with President Thomas Ross of Doylestown presiding.

Hundreds of boys will participate in dramatizations and pageants to portray the splendid work of the 12 Council committees during the past year. Dr. Ray O. Wyland, of the National Staff, has telephoned that he will arrive in Bucks County in the morning to attend a special gathering of ministers at noon time, for a conference on "Scouting and Church Objectives."

In the afternoon, he will meet with a number of the Catholic Priests and laymen to discuss the subject of "The New Plan to Promote Scouting under Catholic Leadership." Dr. Wyland will give the stirring climax to a full day of scouting, by his address at the council meeting, following the dramatizations, with his address of "Scouting is a Game, and the Significance of the Ten Year Program."

It is expected that the seating capacity of the Methodist church, which comfortably seats 600 people, will be taxed to accommodate the audience.

The educational committee has been working many hours, with Scout Executive William F. Livermore, in developing in a dramatic way, the telling of "the story of Scouting." It will be worth the journey of everyone, regardless of the distance from Bristol, to attend the evening program.

JURY IN OVERSHOES VISITS PROPERTY IN DURHAM TOWNSHIP

View Land in the Case of Hermans vs. Harvey K. Riegel

CLAIM $10,000 DAMAGES

Planned Park Development Which They Say Had To Be Abandoned

DOYLESTOWN, Mar. 12—After spending Monday afternoon tramping the rain-soaked locus in quo of a case now on trial in the civil court of Bucks county, a jury of ten men and two women, got their feet back on dry ground this morning as the trial of No. 1 case on Common Pleas Court got under way.

It is the case of Joseph Herman and Theresa Herman, of Durham township, against Harvey K. Riegel, a neighbor and mill owner. The Hermans, whose cause was reversed in an equity proceedings that was settled in a final decree handed down last October by President Judge Hiram H. Keller, are claiming $10,000 damages from the defendant.

The plaintiffs allege that their property, including an unfinished park development that was to have included swimming pool, boating pond, skating and fishing pool, were damaged to the extent that they had to be abandoned because the defendant negligently cared for a certain mill-race or water course that flowed through the properties of the plaintiffs and defendant.

Yesterday the jury visited the site of the mill race and the grounds of both parties in Durham township. It is located at Durham Furnace, where cannon balls were manufactured many years ago during the Revolutionary War.

Members of the jury include George H. Yerkes, Siles; Ella Glazing, Upper Black Eddy; Grant Umberger, Langhorne; Harvey E. Stoneback, Bristol; Betty McKinstry, Doylestown; John A. Rufe, Doylestown; Mitchell Ancker, Bristol; Robert Clayton, South Langhorne; Robert Spahr, Trevoise; Lewis D. Weiss, Quakertown RD.; Charles A. Taylor, Langhorne; Roscoe Snyder, Quakertown.

The plaintiff's statement of claim filed in November, 1931, mentioned $10,000 as the amount of damages sought by Herman and his wife, who own 134 acres in Durham township. The defendant Riegel owns a grist mill nearby.

According to the statement of claim, appurtenant to the mill of the defendant is a mill race or water course leading out of Cook's Run on the lands of the plaintiff and exclusively over, through and along the lands of the plaintiff and through adjoining land owners to the defendant's mill. It is the contention of the Hermans that this water course has existed since 1820 when the original mill on the lands of the defendant was erected.

Riegel, in his affidavit of defense filed December 5, 1931, claims that the raceway existed long before 1820; that it existed during the Revolutionary War upon the site of the historic Durham Furnace.

The plaintiffs allege that the mill race is used for the purpose of supplying power in operation of the mill owned by Riegel. The race, they say, exists by reason of a grant recited in a deed of conveyance from administrators of William Long to the heirs of Jacob N. Fullmer, dated April 1, 1841.

"During the past ten years the defendant has failed to keep the race in proper condition and repair by failing to deepen, cleanse and scour the race and as a result the land of the plaintiffs have become flooded, swampy, marshy and unfit for productivity and general utility," the plaintiff's statement of claim recites.

It is further contended by the plaintiff that negligence of the defendant in failing to clean the mill race, has resulted in a widening of the water right to about 30 feet. The defendant is also charged with cutting down 23 trees along with the water course, which the plaintiffs claimed belonged to them. The defendant is also charged with raising the water level in the dam in Cook's Run in October and November, 1931, above the intake, thus widening the stream. He is also charged with taking the water of a small stream known as Coon Hollow Run, thus depriving the plaintiffs of that water.

When the same fact appeared in an equity case of Riegel vs. Herman, Judge Keller handed down his final decree in October, last year, directing the defendants, Joseph Herman and Theresa Herman, his wife, to pay the costs of the suit. In that decree, the Court ruled that Riegel had the right to use the disputed water stream as he saw fit in the operation of his mill.

"GOOD TIME CHARLIE"

Fallen upon hard times, with collectors instead of Broadway Santa Claus knocking at his door, James J. Walker, former mayor of New York City and of late an expatriate in Europe's pleasant watering places and capitals, says he intends to come back to America next fall.

"I didn't mind being a good time Charlie when I had money," he went on. "When I went out to California on behalf of Tom Mooney I got a swell surprise when I found that I had been charged with just about everybody's expenses at the hotel. It was that way everywhere I went. But those days are over now."

Soon or late, "those days" usually are over for every good time Charlie. In this respect, Jimmie Walker is no exception. When the money is gone, friends go, too. There was a time when more than one rich New Yorker would have been glad to place a few securities in Jimmie Walker's name and strong box. But "those days" are over. Jimmie Walker and his pea green coat are only memories now on Broadway. On the metropolis' thoroughfare more quickly than anywhere else, good time Charlies of yesterday are succeeded by good time Charlies of today.

It is a pity that a man of James J. Walker's unusual opportunities—who was mayor of New York when only 44—has nothing but his "good time Charlie" days to remember. If he had served his city and his public as he might have served, his life would still be ahead of instead of behind him. Perhaps he can come back and yet make good. He has abilities enough.

"DREADFUL ENTANGLEMENTS"

Americans can indulge in a smile at the speech of Premier Pierre-Etienne Flandin at the Washington's Birthday dinner of the American Club in Paris. M. Flandin felt he couldn't speak to Americans without saying something about the sums that France promised to pay us, signing on the dotted line, and then didn't. And this is what he said:

"The one obstacle to the restoration of a feeling of security in the economic life of the world is the dreadful entanglement of international financial obligations, born of the war; obligations the fulfillment of which is suspended without an indication thus far of any general settlement."

M. Flandin knows that this is the pure bunk; that debts which are unpaid and uncollectable, as between governments, have nothing whatsoever to do with security in the world's economic life, which depends almost entirely on private credit. But he had to say something; and adroitly he accepted no responsibility on the part of France. It is a "dreadful entanglement," of which there is no "general settlement."

Nor will there be.

From one of those market letters: "Prices will remain within a narrow range, unless an upward or downward swing sets in."

It is now—see the Pennsylvania Railroad's electric flier's latest record—only 111 minutes from Washington to New York City. Well, Wall Street probably wishes it were much, much farther.

"More Money"

by CHARLES GRANT

SYNOPSIS

Young and pretty Cathleen McCarty, secretary to the wealthy Jasper Ingram, attracts her employer's son Seward. Realizing the difference in their social positions, Cathleen discourages Seward's attentions, but he is persistent and she finally makes an appointment with him. He presents her with an expensive bracelet which Cathleen plans to return, but the gift disappears from her dresser. Marian Alsapugh, frivolous wife of Homer Alsapugh, Ingram's confidential secretary, becomes infatuated with the Marques d'Alhues. She buys a new car to impress the Marques, and the first time she takes him out in it they have an accident and the car is destroyed. Alsapugh speculates with Ingram's money to try and meet his wife's extravagances. Joe, Cathleen's ne'er-do-well brother, reluctantly admits pawning the bracelet for $300. Joe's new job as collector for Ingram gives him too much leisure to spend at the speakeasy frequented by Vergile Buttie, gang leader. Before he married, Pia Roselli, Vergile was interested in a girl named Gemma. Gemma is now Joe's girl. Learning that Buttie's brother, Carmine, is interested in Gemma, Joe stays around to keep an eye on her. Cathleen considers the possibility of getting an advance on her salary to retrieve Seward's bracelet.

CHAPTER XVIII

Would it, she wondered now, in a flurry of rising and falling confidence, be possible to secure an advance of three hundred dollars, against ten dollars to be deducted from her salary for thirty weeks? Of course she couldn't ask Mr. Alsapugh to make the advance personally, she could ask him to speak to the office manager for her. Employees, she knew, do, quite often, in emergencies, get advances against their future salaries, though, naturally such loans were not encouraged by the executives. In Cathleen's case it probably would prove especially difficult as she could not properly specify the emergency.

She was now frantically eager to work late for Alsapugh, for everything seemed to depend on his good will. "I'm always glad to stay," she assured him, when he came into the room to lay a memorandum on Ingram's desk.

"Good," he said. "The same place, eh?"

"Any place will do," she said, "I could work on just coffee and doughnuts sent in."

"Yes, but what about me? I'm going to work late, too. Don't rate a little relaxation?"

At four o'clock Ingram had not returned. Alsapugh went to the oval room with documents unexpectedly called for, and reported to Cathleen that the meeting was stormy. "But the chief's riding the waves, as usual. They should know by now that they can't stand up against him."

At ten minutes past four a woman's angry voice made itself heard through two closed doors in the inner office.

"I insist on seeing Mr. Ingram," Cathleen heard. "Appointment stuff! He'll want to see me, all right. . . . Martin is the name—Miss Arline Martin. . . . I'll go in and wait for him!"

She refused to be stopped. The door of the office burst open and she swept in.

"I'm going to wait here for Mr. Ingram!" she told Cathleen.

The strange, insistent girl was very beautiful, Cathleen thought. Indeed Arline had dressed deliberately to subjugate Jasper and her brilliance had been heightened by the opposition she had over-ridden by the little tussle to get in and in forcing her way in. The enormous summer fur of white fox draping her shoulders, the dangling gypsy hoops in her ears, and the gas-pump red of her frock and hat and high-heeled sandals made it impossible for any man to be satisfied with one look at her.

On her side Arline was annoyed by Cathleen's youthful beauty and the music of her speaking voice. Ingram had this girl at his side while he worked. What couldn't she do with an opportunity like that!

"I shan't disturb you. You can go on with your work. I'll just sit here and wait."

She seated herself in a swirl of white fur and scarlet skirts, and lighted a cigarette fitted into a long slim holder. She was smoking her third cigarette when the door opened and Ingram came in. Cathleen, looking up at the sound of his entrance, saw his face change and not with pleasure, at the sight of his visitor.

"How do you do, Miss Martin. Nice of you to call but I'm afraid I can't afford myself the pleasure of receiving you in the midst of an extremely busy afternoon."

"Not even one little minute for me?" Before he could reply, she went on hastily, "I've heard nothing from you about the play. Mr. Gresham was so interested in what you said. He's rewriting it—and we feel sure that between us we'd have a wonderful hit, if you'd only help us! You did make me think you'd help us, Mr. Ingram, silly of me, but I really thought you meant it."

Arline had risen and moved close to him, her face flashing through the varying expressions of jealousy, playful reproach, happy excitement, and hopeful appeal. She ended with a witchery of parted, smiling lips and wide compelling eyes.

Ingram, far from indifferent to feminine appeal under favorable circumstances, had his mind occupied just now with a critical financial problem. He was, more over, a hard man to move from a position once taken, and nothing had happened, since the day this girl had precipitated the wretched situation between him and his son, to cause him to change his mind.

He said now, "I'm sorry if I roused hopes doomed to disappointment. I was not, as I told you, impressed by your friend's play. Further discussion of the matter is inopportune—and useless."

Arline all but spat at him. Her face, Cathleen noticed in surprise, went suddenly small and ugly with disappointment and rage. "You'll regret this, Mr. Ingram! And there were both viciousness and threat in the tone of her voice."

At the moment, it was evident, she hated him, but her rage was impotent, for what can you do when you are poor and a nobody, against a plutocrat who refuses to betray the weakness of a man? She swept to the door, clutching at the one thing left her, a good exit. But unsmiling and silent, he was there first, holding the door open for her.

Ingram turned back, dropping the irrelevant incident from his mind. "We'll go on from where I left off, Miss McCarthy," he said, "with that letter to the Pittsburgh office."

Cathleen, who had gasped at Arline's prettiness while disapproving her presumption, was sorry for her now in her defeat. But in a little while, preoccupation with her own problem put the stormy intruder out of her mind.

It was nearly eight o'clock before Alsapugh and Cathleen had cleared up the accumulated work. Her eyes, fingers and back were tired, and she had not eaten since noon when worry had made it impossible for her to do more than swallow a cup of tomato bisque and a cracker. As she sat down at the corner table in the speakeasy, she was tremulous and nervous, partly because of her physical condition and partly because of the difficulty she experienced in framing her appeal to Alsapugh.

She would have to lead up gradually of course to her embarrassing, perhaps unheard-of request.

"How is Mrs. Alsapugh? How terrible that accident was!"

"Oh, she's much better. Much, much better," Alsapugh proclaimed blithely. "It might have been a whole lot worse!"

Though he, too, had worked hard and late, he was in high spirits, for the utility stocks he had bought with Ingram's money were already worth several hundred dollars more than he paid for them. Whenever he had looked at the ticker that day, he had found himself a little nearer the amount he needed to pay his debt. The closing price had been the highest of all.

"I'm so glad. I saw Mrs. Alsapugh when she came into the office one day last month," Cathleen pursued, ingeniously flattering him. "She's so pretty, isn't she? It would be so bad if her face had been marked."

"Yes, that's what she thought. That's all she worried about. A three thousand dollar car gone phut—that was the least of her troubles."

Women are all alike, extravagant. No idea of the value of money!"

After she had eaten, Cathleen felt better, and over the salad she found the words she had tentatively put together tumbling effortlessly from her lips.

"Mr. Alsapugh, if a person were in great need of money, do you think the company would possibly make an advance against future salary?"

"What's that?" he asked, startled. "It's—a personal emergency. I need—three hundred dollars." The sum seemed so great to her that her voice shook as she named it.

"Three hundred dollars!" Homer, echoing her, made three hundred dollars sound like three thousand. "My dear girl, that's a lot of money. I'm sure I couldn't say how Mr. Macomber would view such a request. You'd have to take it up with him. I'm afraid he wouldn't enter into it."

"That's why I'm speaking to you first," said Cathleen. "I thought if you'd say a word—it's terribly important to me; I can't explain how important! I'm getting forty dollars now. I could take thirty, or even twenty-five, till this is paid!"

Suddenly her chin shook. She felt tears threatening her, and turned blindly to clutch at her bag, which held her handkerchief.

Alsapugh watching her closely, enjoyed her distress and his own power to intensify or end it, for it would be comparatively easy for him to obtain the advance for her.

What could a girl in Cathleen's circumstances need with three hundred dollars?

Was she playing him for a sucker or was she naively putting herself in his hands? When she talked of getting a loan of three hundred dollars was she delicately hinting that he might offer it himself?

Well, he wouldn't object to that. His love for his wife, genuine and slavish though it was, had never prevented his feeling romantic impulses towards other women.

"Listen, Cathleen, please don't cry," he said. "I'll let you have three hundred dollars. You could have anything I've got. I've always been crazy about you. You must know that." He leaned over and laid his hot moist hand on her arm.

Cathleen, wrenched her wrist free and slipped out of his reach. "Mr. Alsapugh!" she exclaimed. "Aren't you ashamed to say a thing of that sort to me! What have I ever done that gave you the idea of listening to such things? I thought you were decent and friendly. You aren't either one, but you'll know better than to speak to me like that again. You wouldn't like it if I told Mr. Ingram about this, and I will if you bother me again, in the office or out. Forget about the money. I'm sorry I mentioned it. That far it was my fault but it never entered my head you'd be such a—"

I won't say it, but after this when I work late, I'll get my dinner at home. And now good night. Don't you dare come with me. I know the way to the subway well enough."

On the long ride home, she had time to ponder the deplorable state of her affairs. She tried to forget Alsapugh and his disgusting advances. After all, he was nothing to her. But she found she had pinned great hopes on his help in securing the advance. Now she knew she did not dare speak to Mr. Macomber, the office manager, about it, for Alsapugh, out of resentment at her rebuff, would very likely try to make trouble for her in the office. She mustn't do anything herself to jeopardize her position.

If as a result of tonight's happenings, she were to lose her job . . . Cathleen closed her eyes on that possibility. Things were bad enough without worrying over an alarming "perhaps."

She picked up a discarded paper and in it she read of a company that was eager to make advances to business people against their salaries. She knew all about that. It was necessary to have the signatures of two other employed people, and there was no one whom she could ask to assume such a risk for her. . . .

No, there was no hope there—not anywhere that she could see. The next time Seward sought her out, and she felt sure that would be soon she would have to meet him with empty hands and a blot on her escutcheon.

YOUR HEALTH

Health talk of the Pennsylvania State Department of Health and published by the Bristol Borough Board of Health.

Dental Floss

Nature is not at all unreasonable in her demands. But she does ask that the health program be well rounded. It is not sufficient that one scrupulously obeys most of her laws and falls down on the others. The old principle of the chain being only as strong as the weakest link very definitely applies. And what may be said about bodily health in general applies equally to the oral hygiene program. Thus to omit dental floss in the daily hygienic regimen is seriously to undermine the whole prophylactic structure, the Pennsylvania State Department of Health indicated in a statement issued today.

No matter how fine a toothbrush one may use nor how conscientiously it is applied to the teeth and gums, prophylaxis will fall far short of its goal if floss is not put to work. The toothbrush has its limitations. It simply cannot be forced into the intricate crevices and ravines that lie between the teeth. And it is here that particles of food lodge and tartar accumulates.

Used at least once daily, preferably before bedtime, cleanliness in the crevices is provided; and the bacteria that otherwise would have a long uninterrupted period of damaging activity are routed before they even get organized. Moreover, floss removes plaques of fatty material which are a great aid to tartar formation.

It is thus observed that two of the major enemies to healthy teeth and gums can be held well under control so far as the crevices between teeth are concerned by the employment of this supplemental cleansing procedure. That this object be attained is vital.

In fact, it truthfully can be said that many dental cavities and even unhealthy gum conditions get their start simply because persons consider their daily dental job finished when they have used the tooth-brush. It follows, that to set up as complete a defense as is possible, floss must be included. One's dentist is in a position to instruct in its proper use, which use is just as important as the silk itself.

Miss Rita Boyle, Tacony, passed two days in Bristol, as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. John Toomey, Garden street.

"GOOD TIME CHARLIE"

Fallen upon hard times, with collectors instead of Broadway Santa Claus knocking at his door, James J. Walker, former mayor of New York City and of late an expatriate in Europe's pleasant watering places and capitals, says he intends to come back to America next fall.

"I didn't mind being a good time Charlie when I had money," he went on. "When I went out to California on behalf of Tom Mooney I got a swell surprise when I found that I had been charged with just about everybody's expenses at the hotel. It was that way everywhere I went. But those days are over now."

Soon or late, "those days" usually are over for every good time Charlie. In this respect, Jimmie Walker is no exception. When the money is gone, friends go, too. There was a time when more than one rich New Yorker would have been glad to place a few securities in Jimmie Walker's name and strong box. But "those days" are over. Jimmie Walker and his pea green coat are only memories now on Broadway. On the metropolis' thoroughfare more quickly than anywhere else, good time Charlies of yesterday are succeeded by good time Charlies of today.

It is a pity that a man of James J. Walker's unusual opportunities—he was mayor of New York when only 44—has nothing but his "good time Charlie" days to remember. If he had served his city and his public as he might have served, his life would still be ahead of instead of behind him. Perhaps he can come back and yet make good. He has abilities enough.

"DREADFUL ENTANGLEMENTS"

Americans can indulge in a smile at the speech of Premier Pierre-Etienne Flandin at the Washington's Birthday dinner of the American Club in Paris. M. Flandin felt he couldn't speak to Americans without saying something about the sums that France promised to pay us, signing on the dotted line, and then didn't. And this is what he said:

"The one obstacle to the restoration of a feeling of security in the economic life of the world is the dreadful entanglement of international financial obligations, born of the war; obligations the fulfillment of which is suspended without an indication thus far of any general settlement."

M. Flandin knows that this is the pure bunk; that debts which are unpaid and uncollectable, as between governments, have nothing whatsoever to do with security in the world's economic life, which depends almost entirely on private credit. But he had to say something; and adroitly he accepted no responsibility on the part of France. It is a "dreadful entanglement," of which there is no "general settlement."

Nor will there be.

From one of those market letters: "Prices will remain within a narrow range, unless an upward or downward swing sets in."

It is now—see the Pennsylvania Railroad's electric flier's latest record—only 111 minutes from Washington to New York City. Well, Wall Street probably wishes it were much, much farther.

"More Money"

by CHARLES GRANT

SYNOPSIS
Young and pretty Cathleen McCarthy, secretary to the wealthy Jasper Ingram, attracts her employer's son Seward. Realizing the difference in their social positions, Cathleen discourages Seward's attentions, but he is persistent and she finally makes an appointment with him. He presents her with an expensive bracelet which Cathleen plans to return, but the gift disappears from her dresser. Marian Alspaugh, frivolous wife of Joe Alspaugh, Ingram's confidential secretary, becomes infatuated with the Marquis d'Alhues. She buys a new car to impress the Marquis, and the first time she takes him out in it they have an accident and the car is destroyed. Alspaugh speculates with Ingram's money to try and meet his wife's extravagances. Joe, Cathleen's never-do-well brother, reluctantly admits pawning the bracelet for $300. Joe's new job as collector for Ingram gives him too much leisure to spend at the speakeasy frequented by Vergie Buttie, gang leader. Before he married Pia Roselli, Vergie was interested in a girl named Gemma. Gemma is now Joe's girl. Learning that Buttie's brother, Carmine, is interested in Gemma, Joe stays around to keep an eye on her. Cathleen considers the possibility of getting an advance on her salary to retrieve Seward's bracelet.

CHAPTER XVIII

Would it, she wondered now, in a hurry of rising and falling confidence, be possible to secure an advance of three hundred dollars, against ten dollars to be deducted from her salary for thirty weeks? Of course she couldn't ask Mr. Alspaugh to make the advance personally; she could ask him to speak to the office manager for her. Employees, she knew, do, quite often, in emergencies, get advances against their future salaries, though, naturally such loans were not encouraged by the executives. In Cathleen's case it probably would prove especially difficult as she could not properly specify the emergency.

She was now frantically eager to work late for Alspaugh, for everything seemed to depend on his good will. "I'm always glad to stay," she assured him, when he came into the room to lay a memorandum on Ingram's desk.

"Good," he said. "The same place, eh?"

"Any place will do," she said, "I could work on just coffee and doughnuts sent in."

"Yes, but what about me? I'm going to work late, too. Don't I rate a little relaxation?"

At four o'clock Ingram had not returned. Alspaugh went to the oval room with documents unexpectedly called for, and reported to Cathleen that the meeting was stormy. "But the chief's riding the waves, as usual. They should know by now that they can't stand up against him."

At ten minutes past four a woman's angry voice made itself heard through two closed doors in the inner office.

"I insist on seeing Mr. Ingram," Cathleen heard. "Appointment stuff! He'll want to see me, all right. . . . Martin is the name—Miss Arline Martin. . . . I'll go in and wait for him!"

She refused to be stopped. The door of the office burst open and she swept in.

"I'm going to wait here for Mr. Ingram!" she told Cathleen.

The strange, insistent girl was very beautiful, Cathleen thought. Indeed Arline had dressed deliberately to subjugate Jasper and her brilliance had been heightened by the opposition she had over-riden by the little tussle to get in and in forcing her way in. The enormous summer fur of white fox draping her shoulders, the damping floppy hoops in her frock and hat and high-heeled sandals made it impossible for any man to be satisfied with one look at her.

On her side Arline was annoyed by Cathleen's youthful beauty and the music of her speaking voice.

Ingram had this girl at his side while he worked. What couldn't she do with an opportunity like that!

"I shan't disturb you. You can go on with your work. I'll just sit here and wait."

She seated herself in a swirl of white fur and scarlet skirts, and lighted a cigarette fitted into a long slim holder. She was smoking her third cigarette when the door opened and Ingram came in. Cathleen, looking up at the sound of his entrance, saw his face change and not with pleasure, at the sight of his visitor.

"How do you do, Miss Martin. Nice of you to call but I'm afraid I can't afford myself the pleasure of receiving you in the midst of an extremely busy afternoon."

"No? Not even a little minute for me?" Before he could reply, she went on hastily, "I've heard nothing from you about the play. Mr. Gresham was so interested in what you said. He's rewriting it—and we feel sure that between us we'd have a wonderful hit, if you'd only help us. You did make me think you'd help us, Mr. Ingram, silly of me, but I really thought you meant it."

Arline had risen and moved close to him, her face flashing through the varying expressions of cajolery, playful reproach, happy excitement and hopeful appeal. She ended with a witchery of parted, smiling lips and wide compelling eyes.

Ingram, far from indifferent to feminine appeal under favorable circumstances, had his mind occupied just now with a critical financial problem. He was, moreover, a hard nut to melt from a position, once taken, and nothing had happened, since the day this girl had precipitated the wretched situation between him and his son, to cause him to change his mind.

He said now, "I'm sorry if I roused hopes doomed to disappointment. I was not, as I told you, impressed by your friend's play. Further discussion of the matter is inopportune—and useless."

Arline all but spat at him. Her face, Cathleen noticed in surprise, went suddenly small and ugly with disappointment and rage. "You'll regret this, Mr. Ingram!" And there were both viciousness and threat in the tone of her voice.

At the moment, it was evident, she hated him, but her rage was impotent, for what can you do when you are poor and a nobody, against a plutocrat who refuses to betray the weaknesses of youth? She knew that, clutching at the one thing left her, a good exit. But unsmiling and silent, he was there first, holding the door open for her.

Ingram turned back, dropping the irrelevant incident from his mind. "We'll go on from where I left off, Miss McCarthy," he said, "with that letter to the Pittsburgh office."

Cathleen, who had gasped at Arline's prettiness while disapproving her presumption, was sorry for her now in her defeat. But in a little while, preoccupation with her own problems put the stormy intruder out of her mind.

It was nearly eight o'clock before Alspaugh and Cathleen had cleared up the accumulated work. Her eyes, fingers and back were tired, and she had not eaten since noon when worry had made it impossible for her to do more than swallow a cup of tomato bisque and a cracker. As she sat down at the corner table in the speakeasy, she was tremulous and nervous, partly because of her physical condition and partly because of the difficulty she experienced in framing her appeal to Alspaugh.

She would have to lead up gradually to her case to her embarrassment, perhaps unheard-of request.

"How is Mrs. Alspaugh? How terrible that accident was!"

"Oh, she's much better. Much, much better," Alspaugh proclaimed lightly. "It might have been a whole lot worse!"

Though he, too, had worked hard and late, he was in high spirits, for the utility stocks he had bought with Ingram's money were already worth several hundred dollars more than he paid for them. Whenever he had looked at the ticker that day, he had found himself a little nearer the amount he needed to pay his debt. The closing price had been the highest of all.

"I'm so glad. I saw Mrs. Alspaugh when she came into the office one day last month," Cathleen pursued, ingeniously flattering him.

"She's so pretty, isn't she? It would have been too bad if her face had been marked."

"Yes, that's what she thought. That's all she worried about. A three thousand dollar car gone phut—that was the least of her troubles."

Women are all alike, extravagant. No idea of the value of money!"

After she had eaten, Cathleen felt better, and over the salad she found the words she had tentatively put together tumbling effortlessly from her lips.

"Mr. Alspaugh, if a person were in great need of money, do you think the company would possibly make an advance against future salary?"

"What's that?" he asked, startled. "It's a personal emergency. I need—three hundred dollars." The sum seemed so great to her that her voice shook as she named it.

"Three hundred dollars!" Homer, echoing her, made three hundred dollars sound like three thousand. "My dear girl, that's a lot of money. I'm sure I couldn't say how Mr. Alspaugh would view such a request. You'd have to take it up with him. I'm afraid he wouldn't entertain it."

"That's why I'm speaking to you first," said Cathleen. "I thought if you'd say a word—it's terribly important to me; I can't explain how important! I'm getting forty dollars now. I could take thirty, or even twenty-five, till this is paid."

Suddenly her chin shook. She felt tears threatening her, and turned blindly to clutch at her bag, which held her handkerchief.

Alspaugh, watching her closely, enjoyed her distress and his own power to intensify or end it, for it would be comparatively easy for him to obtain the advance for her.

What could a girl in Cathleen's circumstances need with three hundred dollars?

Was she playing him for a sucker or was she naively putting herself in his hands? When she talked of getting a loan of three hundred dollars was she delicately hinting that he might offer it himself?

Well, he wouldn't object to that. His love for his wife, genuine and slavish though it was, had never prevented his feeling romantic impulses towards other women.

"Listen, Cathleen, please don't cry," he said. "I'll let you have three hundred dollars. You could have anything I've got. I've always been crazy about you. You must know that." He leaned over and laid his hot moist hand on her arm.

Cathleen, wrenched her wrist free and slipped out of his reach. "Mr. Alspaugh!" she exclaimed. "Aren't you ashamed to say a thing of that sort to me? What have I ever done that gave you the idea I'd listen to such things? I thought you were decent and friendly. You aren't either one, but you'll know better than to speak to me like that again. You wouldn't like it if I told Mr. Ingram about this, and I will if you bother me again, in the office or out. Forget about the money. I'm sorry I mentioned it. That far it was my fault but it never entered my head you'd be such a —"

I won't say it, but after this when I work late, I'll get my dinner at home. And now good night. Don't you dare come with me. I know the way to the subway well enough."

On the long ride home, she had time to ponder the deplorable state of her affairs. She tried to forget Alspaugh and his disgusting advances. After all, he was nothing to her. But she found she had pinned great hopes on his help in securing the advance. Now she knew she did not dare speak to Mr. Macomber, the office manager, about it, for Alspaugh, out of resentment at her rebuff, would very likely try to make trouble for her in the office. She mustn't do anything herself to jeopardize her position.

If as a result of tonight's happenings, she were to lose her job —

Cathleen closed her eyes on that possibility. Things were bad enough without worrying over an alarming "perhaps."

She picked up a discarded paper and in it she read of a company that was eager to make advances to business people against their salaries. She knew all about that. It was necessary to have the signatures of two other employed people, and there was no one whom she could ask to assume such a risk for her. . . .

No, there was no hope there—not anywhere that she could see. The next time Seward sought her out, and she felt sure that would be soon, she would have to meet him with empty hands and a blot on her escutcheon.

YOUR HEALTH

Health talk of the Pennsylvania State Department of Health and published by the Bristol Borough Board of Health.

Dental Floss

Nature is not at all unreasonable in her demands. But she does ask that the health program be well rounded. It is not sufficient that one scrupulously obeys most of her laws and falls down on the others. The old principle of the chain being only as strong as the weakest link very definitely applies. And what may be said about bodily health in general applies equally to the oral hygiene program. Thus to omit dental floss in the daily hygienic regimen is seriously to undermine the whole prophylactic structure, the Pennsylvania State Department of Health indicated in a statement issued today.

No matter how fine a toothbrush one may use nor how conscientiously it is applied to the teeth and gums, prophylaxis will fall far short of its goal if floss is not put to work. The toothbrush has its limitations. It simply cannot be forced into the intricate crevices and ravines that lie between the teeth. And it is here that particles of food lodge and tartar accumulates.

Used at least once daily, preferably before bedtime, cleanliness in the crevices is provided; and the bacteria that otherwise would have a long uninterrupted period of damaging activity are routed before they even get organized. Moreover, floss removes plaques of fatty material, which are a great aid to tartar formation.

It is thus observed that two of the major enemies to healthy teeth and gums can be held well under control so far as the crevices between teeth are concerned by the employment of this supplemental cleansing procedure. That this object be attained is vital.

In fact, it truthfully can be said that many dental cavities and even unhealthy gum conditions get their start simply because persons consider their daily dental job finished when they have used the tooth-brush. It follows, that to set up as complete a defense as is possible, floss must be included. One's dentist is in a position to instruct in its proper use, which use is just as important as the silk itself.

Miss Rita Boyle, Tacony, passed two days in Bristol, as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. John Toomey, Garden street.

Democrats Jittery Over Tax Protests

publicans will follow the same tactics they followed two years ago, clamoring for greater cuts in departmental costs. The educators will raise considerable hullabaloo over the fact that practically $11,000,000 of the $16,000,000 stressed by Governor Earle has been effected in appropriations to the public schools, State colleges and State-aided educational institutions.

A new and powerful opponent of the Governor's tax program turned up during the week in the huge and powerful Mutual Insurance and Casualty Companies of Pennsylvania—260 of them doing a business of $50,000,000 a year—which say that if the Governor's plans are carried out they will have to go out of business and that cost of insurance to the people will be greatly increased—probably trebled. They are uniting for a State-wide fight against the Administration.

Leader of Greek Rebellion Seeks Refuge at Cassos

disguised as an ordinary seaman aboard a freighter, Venizelos may try to go to the Italian-owned Dodecanese Islands, or even make for France, always to be depended upon as a haven for political refugees, although it was doubted that the Averoff had sufficient fuel. The ship was also understood to have been hit by air bombs last week.

Hostages seized on Crete were released and government authorities re-installed in power after the rebels fled.

One of the last rebel ships to revolt to the government was the destroyer Psara, which was anchored in Suda Bay, Crete. The revolutionary officers abandoned her, and the crew wired-lessly to Athens for orders.

McCARTHY CLAIMS EVERYTHING IS O-K

By Davis J. Walsh
I. N. S. Sports Editor

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla., Mar. 12.—(INS)—Joseph Vincent McCarthy, the gentleman who manages this New York ball club for better, for worse and occasionally for neither, went back twenty-five years today and seemed to become again the small boy who whistles passing the grave yard at twilight.

Twilight in the life of the Yankees was reached some days ago when 4,000 gathered here to watch the Boston Braves and their new right fielder, vice president, assistant manager and exhibit A, while less than 200 viewed the strangely forlorn Yankees. It used to be the other way around here, but that was before the Yankees evicted Ruth and the Braves gave him sanctuary.

Nevertheless, even with Ruth still on the premises under a one-year lease, it would only have meant one more body for the Yanks to bury. One by one, the great champions of 1932 are being piously but promptly laid at rest, so that before long very little will remain except the headstones.

But Mr. McCarthy says everything is going to be all right. After all he can still whistle.

With this exception and that of Ruth, the club is pretty much the same outfit that finished second last year and probably won't do any worse this time. For years, it always has been the club to beat and it still is, with two of the game's greatest in Gehrig, the hitter, and Gomez, the pitcher. He won 26 games last year.

"And," says McCarthy, "he hasn't started to come to his best. My other starters are Johnny Broaca, who came to the club without training last year and ought to be twice as good; Charley Ruffing, winner of 19 and still good; and Johnny Murphy, who will always be good because he knows where to throw that ball."

"All I can say for the Tigers is that they'd better not be any worse," he announced today. "As it is, I figure we'll beat them anyhow. My pitching is better and it was downright good last year. So is my infield, with Orosco just maturing at shortstop and Rolfe coming on like a house afire at third base in the closing weeks of last season. My outfield defense is better, my attack is at least equal."

If this was intended as an implied criticism of Ruth, Mr. McCarthy declined with hauteur to confirm the idea.

"We were not," said he, "discussing Ruth. He belongs to another club."

"Combs is as good as ever," says McCarthy.

Untold Stories of Hauptmann Case

at least. Nobody testified they saw him enter the baby's nursery and abduct the child. When Mrs. Franklin

D. Roosevelt was quoted recently as saying Hauptmann was convicted on circumstantial evidence and that she was "a little perturbed" over the verdict, she reflected the views of a number of other persons.

It was Hauptmann's contention, supported by defense witnesses, including his wife, Anna, that he was in the Bronx, New York City, on the night of March 1, 1932—the night the baby was kidnapped from his home in Hopewell, N. J.

Early that fateful evening Hauptmann insists, he called for his wife at the bakery-restaurant of the Fredricksens, where she was employed as a waitress. Then, he further stated, he and his wife went to their home in the Bronx where they remained the rest of the night.

On this mooted point—where Hauptmann was that night—you can believe one of two things. Either you believe the sworn testimony of prosecution witnesses that they saw Hauptmann in a car containing a ladder in New Jersey shortly before the crime was committed, or you believe the stories of defense witnesses, including Hauptmann himself, that he was in New York City the night the baby was kidnapped.

"Did Hauptmann do the job alone?" The state says, "Yes;" the defense insists a number of persons participated in the crime.

During the trial the defense sought to show, inferentially at least, that the kidnapping was an "inside job" and that servants in the Lindbergh household knew something about it. This contention was vigorously denied by state witnesses and Colonel Lindbergh himself made it apparent he placed no credence whatever in such intimations. Intimations that "a gang" perpetrated the crime was also scoffed at by the prosecution.

"Is there any chance Hauptmann will make a confession?"

Hauptmann himself told me the answer to this one. He said "No." "I have nothing to confess," said Hauptmann. "If I had a confession to make I would have done so five months ago and would have saved my wife and my child and my mother all the misery they have gone through."

"I am innocent. If they were to come into this cell and say to me: 'Confess and you can walk out free' I could not tell them the story of this kidnapping because I do not know anything about it. I was not there when the baby was kidnapped. I told the whole truth on the stand. I am not covering up anybody. I have nothing to cover up. I have told all I know."

Hauptmann, now "Convict 17,400" in the New Jersey state prison, awaiting imposition of the death sentence occupies "Cell 9" in the death house. He wears a convict's uniform—blue breeches, blue shirt and shoes. His head is shaved. Other prisoners are making him as uncomfortable as they can, but he is receiving all the attention from prison authorities that deathhouse prisoners usually get. He has the same food as the prison guards, all the smokes he wants and reading matter.

Mr. Kilgallen takes readers behind the scenes of the "trial of the century" in the third article of this series, tomorrow.
